I thought the ERC does handle violent offenders, I guess depending on how we define violent. Not serious enough to go into detention, but basically these are kids who otherwise might be.

Unless Amy wants to make it more specific, I think the current language in the power point is appropriate for Thursday - that the JAC is geared toward nonviolent delinquents and status offenders and that expanding the ERC concept is geared toward serving more delinquents. (The only possible change I would suggest considering is to say expansion of the ERC concept is geared toward serving more NONVIOLENT delinquents - if Amy wants that change).

To be more specific is to box Judge Michael and others in when they will need to give much more thought to the exact parameters.

Hi Blair,

Under consideration: Extend the age of Juvenile Court jurisdiction beyond 19 and explore local treatment facility options for those delinquent youth in need of services.

Re: ERC: I think Judge Michael mentioned the point system they use to determine detention-worthy. These ERC kids may come in a lower tier but are still charged with more serious offenses. If they are low-level offenders, they don't need an intervention and in fact, interventions can be counterproductive by exposing them to more dangerous kids. It depends on what they determine the ultimate purpose of the ERC: is it to ensure these kids turn up at their disposition hearings and don't commit new offenses before they get to court and/or to prevent reoffending altogether? I'm actually reading an empirical study right now about ERCs and it raises some questions which we may need to discuss with the JC folks.

Re: Crimes for JAC: these are misdemeanors and status offenses. Depending on how the JAC gets structured, it could be limited to first-time or at most second-time offenders. Are you asking for examples of misdemeanors? Simple assaults would probably be a big category as well as drug possession. I do have a run down from the Miami report on all the charges that are JAC-worthy there. Their largest categories were domestic violence (assaults) (#3), petty theft (#1), possession of weed (#2), simple battery, trespassing (for year end 2015).

Thanks Brona. It would be ideal if you can be more specific before the board meeting on what crimes we re thinking would qualify kids for JAC and what crime would qualify them for ERC.

Also, didn't we also say we re actively exploring as a potential additional strategy to: Extending from age 19 to age 20-something the age at which juvenile offenders get transferred to adult incarceration; and at the same time bringing the state juvenile detention funding and facility back to Shelby county? Maybe this is something Amy will mention in her slide deck as having an exploring status associated with it.

I've made the 2 changes discussed this morning. Changed order of strategies 1 and 2 in the community engagement goal and changed MERCY to JAC. Here you go.

I've made the changes to the PowerPoint slides to reflect this as well.

Juvenile Assessment Center is clear and descriptive. The average person is most likely to understand what this is. Just my two cents worth.

Then, I suggest we call it Juvenile Assessment Center or we will be stick with Mercy like we have been stuck with GRASSY all these years.

Subject: Updated OSC3 Draft--Revised 9-26-16

Good afternoon all,

I am attaching an updated draft of the OSC 3 plan with explanatory paragraphs.

- In consultation with Amy, we have re-ordered the goals to feature community engagement more prominently. This represents Richard's statement in his March memo that our plan should reflect the national conversation, and this goal is distinctly different from elements of OSC2.
- I have filled in the needed detail on the juvenile strategies both for MERCY and the evening reporting centers, including some proposed KPGs.
- This version reflects the edits Bill made to the last draft. It includes some slightly revised language for juvenile delinquency, as we discussed in last Friday's meeting.

If there are any questions or you notice something that needs correcting, please let me know.

Thank you.
